"So you found a new ski trail, Rinky," said the little cowboy's father as they trudged up the snow-covered slope together.

"Yes, Daddy. I learned a new trick, too, while I was skiing alone!" said Rinky.

"Ha, ha! A trick? That's rich. Why I'll bet you can just about ski down the hill without falling a dozen times!"

"I used to fall all the time but now I know how to keep my balance. You should have seen the way I went down this dangerous new trail that I found."

"Where is this new trail?" asked Rinky's father.

"Oh, I don't want you to try it. You might get . . . er . . .

"Please, Daddy. I wish you wouldn't try it. There's a trick to it. You see, this new ski trail must . . ." said Rinky as his father waved an impatient hand in front of him.

"Say no more! Certainly if you can ski down this trail there is no reason why an experienced skier like myself can't do it! Show me the trail!" said Rinky's father sternly.

Minutes later they stood looking down a steep hill. Rinky pointed to a single set of ski marks in the snow. "My skis made those tracks yesterday, Daddy," said the sad-faced little cowboy.

"This should be easy. I'll follow your tracks. Now just watch your father!" shouted Rinky's father as he started down the steep slope.

"Wait, Daddy! You've got to listen . . ." But it was too late. Already Rinky's father was speeding down the trail which curled in and out of the forest and around rocks. Rinky followed his father down the slope.

"Rinky doesn't know what an expert skier I am," Rinky's father said to himself as he sped down the trail. "Still, I'd better watch Rinky's ski tracks. It is a fast trail. I wonder what Rinky meant when he said there was a trick to this trail . . . YOWEE!" shouted Rinky's father as he skied smack into a tree.

Several minutes later he opened his eyes and Rinky said, "Are you all right, Daddy?"

Rinky's father smiled sadly as he tenderly touched a large lump on his head and said gently, "Just fair, Rinky. You see, one thing troubles me deeply. I followed your trail, but I hit a tree. How, Rinky, did you get one ski on each side of the tree?"

Rinky's father shuddered and covered both blackened eyes with his hands as Rinky said, "That's what I wanted to tell you. It was the trick I learned yesterday. I skied down the trail two times. But each time I only used one ski!"
